Why They Matter

House Iarnailo is a warning dressed up as a welcome. Their motto, "Sweet is the poison of the flower," says exactly what they are: beautiful on the surface, dangerous underneath. The thistle on their crest says the same thing differently:

resilient, thorned, and not to be grabbed carelessly. Where other houses lead with military force or religious weight, House Iarnailo leads with allure and the understanding that hidden weapons are often more effective than visible ones.

Heraldry

Crest: A green thistle with a pink bloom rises prominently against a white field, divided horizontally by a grey band. The thorned stem and jagged leaves are rendered in careful detail.

Symbolism: The thistle represents resilience, protection, and noble suffering. The soft pink of the flower contrasts sharply with the aggressive green thorns, creating visual tension that mirrors the house's philosophy: beauty that conceals danger, sweetness that masks poison. The grey horizontal band suggests pragmatism or neutrality as a foundation. The white background implies purity or innocence that the thorned flower disrupts. This crest warns as much as it welcomes.

Motto: "Sweet is the poison of the flower."
