Why They Matter

In a kingdom where most houses worship a pantheon, House Renalagardo's motto pledges honor to "the one true god." That's a declaration that Vapaz stands so far above the other gods that the rest barely count. It sets them apart. Their crest puts a golden fly at the heart of a black rose, pairing something most people would swat away with something most people would call beautiful. The message: even the smallest and most overlooked things serve the divine purpose. For a Baron-level house, that's a telling philosophy. They find the sacred in what others dismiss.

Heraldry

Crest: Against a cream-colored field divided by a golden horizontal band, a large black rose with green leaves and detailed petals dominates the composition. At its heart sits a golden fly rendered with remarkable precision.

Symbolism: The black rose traditionally symbolizes rebirth, farewell, or devotion unto death. The golden fly, often associated with decay but rendered here in precious metal, suggests that even the smallest and most overlooked creatures serve the divine purpose. The golden band reinforces prosperity and divine light. The overall composition suggests House Renalagardo finds religious truth in paradox, seeing the sacred in the profane and honoring "the one true god" through the recognition that all creation, beautiful or base, serves the divine will.

Motto: "Honor to the one true god."
